However, even if you're careful to keep your original image, your finished image may be color-managed. You can't tell the difference between a color-managed image and a noncolor-managed (or image-managed) version of an image. The images just look alike. The difference is that when you open a photo in Photoshop, the Viewer doesn't display the colors the way you see them. On the other hand, if you import a picture from a scanner, online photo-sharing site, or other source that was not color-managed, the image may not show the colors the way you see them. This type of camera scan is known as a `_sRGB_` scan. If you save an image to a certain file type, such as a JPEG, the original colors are preserved. `_Saving_` is a simple procedure — just save the image to the desired format. When color-managed images are opened, Photoshop suggests the best setting for the output device, allowing you to fine-tune the display color. You can set the color setting of an image to `_sRGB_` (standard RGB), `_Adobe RGB_` (or `_trichromatic_`), `_CMYK_` (four-color), or ProPhoto RGB (`_by-primary-color_`, another Adobe RGB color space). The four available color profiles are illustrated in Figure 8-1. Figure 8-1: I can easily swap the two colors on a spot in your image without having to worry about the original colors being lost or tainted in the process.

Q: What is the difference between (1 2 3) and (1..3) While studying "User Generated Commands in Racket" at I have Question: what are the difference between (1 2 3) and (1..3)? A: The difference between them is that the (1..3) is a variable list of 3 elements. (1 2 3) is a single element list. You can think of a variable list as a list in which the element is itself an unevaluated list, which might be expanded to many elements if necessary. For instance: `> (list 3 1 2 4) ((3 1 2 4)) > (list 1 2 3) (1 2 3)` apiece. They then piled wood and set it on fire, after which the company retired back to their quarters in the grand old Fort.
