/08/18 Thanks David. Sorry I only just found your blog now. I've been reading for a while, but with all the changes and new projects, there's a lot to catch up on, so it's been very difficult. It's a lot of fun reading all the comments. I'm an old retired electrician that worked on the construction of the AGS, and I've been keeping my eye on them for a long time. I know from what I've read, you think it would make a good rollercoaster. I've done a bit of reading on them and I'm not convinced. I think that if done well, it can be a bit of a rollercoaster, but that it's impossible to be 100% guaranteed. The right design can make it safe and fun at the same time, but the AGS is such a uniquely stupid design that it makes it practically impossible to ensure 100% safety. I can imagine that the AGS could be quite scary if done right. The safety systems on rollercoasters are often there to keep you from doing stupid stuff like walking around the ride. But the AGS doesn't care if you do stupid stuff. It only cares if you die or something bad happens to you. You don't have to be 100% sure that something will happen to you, because the AGS will kill you if it does. I think that if the AGS is built right, then there's a good chance that the ride can be a lot of fun. But if it's built wrong, then it's pretty much guaranteed to be a painful death and certain to be a safety hazard. I don't see how anyone can think that it's going to be safe and easy to build. I think it's a very bad design, and one that isn't worth the risk. It seems like a great idea, but it's a terrible idea. I agree, a lot of people have said that it is possible to make them safe, but nothing is 100% safe. I would want them, as I am afraid of heights and roller coasters as well. However, there are heights that are a lot safer than AGS, for example the Petit Eiffel Tower. As long as it is a real rollercoaster, that isn't the point, the point is that it isn't safe. AGS is so incredibly stupid that it will almost certainly hurt somebody 82157476af
